Sent to pupils to look at Christmas cards created by a year 7 pupil - who goes to the same school as the couple. Examine their creativity and provide a brief comment. Include: Pics of the cards Describe the students' creative use of different types of lettering Use of a variety of fonts How the fonts are used to establish the meaning How the use of colour make the meanings clearer Which colour was used in which lettering Which letters are bolded and how Overall look and design

Task Tips Choose a set of photographs and write a page of descriptive words that could be used in an example of a Christmas card. Choose a contemporary design and wording that is clear and simple. There will be a specific font but it need not be the original font used in the card.

I'm sure that actually still happens. If it doesn't, there are probably big consequences in the evolution of the spine. In fact I'm not entirely convinced that the neural net invented spines; in the evolutionary sense the developmental process that leads up to spines of some kind seems to be so important. We'll end on a bit of speculation. So far, I'd almost said that spines aren't used for adaptive reasons. But there is one exception, one thing they are good for: perception. In other words, the ability to sense, and to respond to, what's around you. The one place where I've seen a spine in real action is in the vertebrate ear. In humans, the bony element that houses the eardrum, the ossicles. When you heard about an ear problem, you're most likely thinking about hearing loss. But the problem you have can be less threatening, and possibly less damaging to your ability to hear. The opposite of a damaged ossicle is an accessory ossicle. In humans, all the bones of the middle ear are simple indentations in the bone. The accessory ossicles are thin plates, often helping to stretch and shorten the muscles that move the middle ear bones against each other.
