Their findings reinforce previous previous research on the relationship among a healthy low-fat diet, higher fruit intake, and improved cognitive abilities in healthy adults [2]. An American-Italian researchers from UC San Diego's Department of Environmental Health found that an improved diet (35%–66% fruit from fruit and veggie source or meat from meat source) has a strong influence on memory at baseline [3]. This suggests that higher fruit and veggie consumption may enhance memory, and could enhance cognitive performance, as well as improve diet habits. The same researchers also found that high fruit intake has been associated with less insulin resistance after an insulin resistance epidemic, and with improved blood glucose control [4.. The participants tested were over 20 and had been matched for age, height, weight, parity, maternal smoking status, maternal education and education levels, income and ethnicity. They could consume their recommended fruit allowances of 20% fruit from 3 different stores across the day: at 2, 5, and 18, and a variety of fruits at 6, 12, and 24 hours. A single fruit at each store was included to avoid possible differences between the supermarkets. The fruit allowances were calculated as a ratio of 1:1:2 fruits/fat (50/25), and were calculated across each participant's baseline and study days to ensure the study was representative..
